As with many industries, the global real estate industry has to contend with the effects of the pandemic. The hardest hit is the commercial space sector, specifically those dealing with offices and retail spaces. In the residential space sector, the most visible effect of the pandemic can be seen in the demand for residential properties, as prospective homeowners shift their attention to the suburbs, away from the cities where the pandemic is in full swing.

The health and growth of the real estate industry rest on many economic factors. Residential firms take into account population growth and inflation, among others, to steer their company in the right direction. This, in view of the fact that the population has reached 326.7 million as of 2019 and growing. Moreover, future forecasts seem to favor the industry, especially Millennials, who become first-home buyers. Here are some data and statistics to help you gauge the state of the market today and its future. As can be seen, the real estate market share of Millennials will rise in the near future. Also, Millennials use technology more often than not to find things that they need and want. Indeed, the real estate industry needs to cater to this market segment more and more if firms are to keep themselves relevant. We will tackle the role of technology a little later. Real estate that produces income or is in some other way meant for investment reasons as opposed to be a primary residence is referred to as real estate investment. Investors frequently own several pieces of real estate, one of which is utilized as a primary residence and the others to produce rental income and profit through price growth. Investing in real estate has different tax consequences than buying a home, which is a common difference. The ability to create passive income through the collection of rent, move-in fees, pet rent, and other fees is the primary benefit of investing in real estate. In addition, rental properties typically appreciate over time, meaning the value of the property increases yearly.
